PRESENTER

Howard Johnston, Ph.D.

Dr. Johnston is a Professor of Education at the University of South Florida, where he teaches courses on middle level education, school restructuring, and teaching at-risk and challenging youth. He has written over 100 works on middle level education and has given nearly 1,000 presentations, lectures and papers on all aspects of education for adolescents.

WORKSHOP I

High Stakes Testing

January 4, 2001

This workshop focuses on the leadership tasks associated with fostering high test performance on state and national tests. It includes activities to be used in schools to focus attention on tested material, align standards, curriculum, instruction and testing, and build a culture of achievement in the school. It also provides internet and online resources for test enhancement.

.3 CEUs given for each workshop

WORKSHOP II

Home, School and Community Relations

March 7, 2001

This session addresses the critical role of home, school and community relations in local support for school and success of students in the school. Based on an understanding of the New American family, changing community structures, and increasing diversity, this session provides concrete, practical strategies for addressing community concerns about schools, promoting the school's positive image among families and in the community, and building local support for the school.

WORKSHOP III

Managing Persistent Misbehavior

April 4, 2001

A large portion of the school's behavior challenges often come from a small minority of students. This session examines effective strategies for responding to persistent misbehavior and increasing productive student behavior for some of the most challenging students. These school-based strategies include approaches for working with special education students on IEPs as well as other challenging populations.
